Competitiveness of the U.S. Chemical Industry in International Markets

Jaromir J. Ulbrecht, Editor

(AIChE Symposium Series Volume 86, No. 274)

To define the international issues and special challenges facing the U.S. chemical industry, the Institute organized a symposium on "Competitiveness of the U.S. Chemical Industry in International Markets" held in San Francisco on November 9, 1989.

Papers presented at the symposium in San Francisco provide a wealth of data on current and future trends in international chemical trade. This book is a valuable source of information for a broad spectrum of industry—from large and small companies, to trade associations, government and academia.

Now, corporate planners, educators, government agencies and businesses alike can find out:

- where to go to obtain advice and assistance to compete successfully overseas;
- how to form alliances that will help overcome barriers and obstacles to trade;
- how EC-92 will affect the balance of trade;
- the special opportunities presented by the implementation of free trade with Canada;
- how to understand and successfully work through the complex Asian market;
- and much more.
