

A Journal of the Gesellschaft Deutscher Chemiker

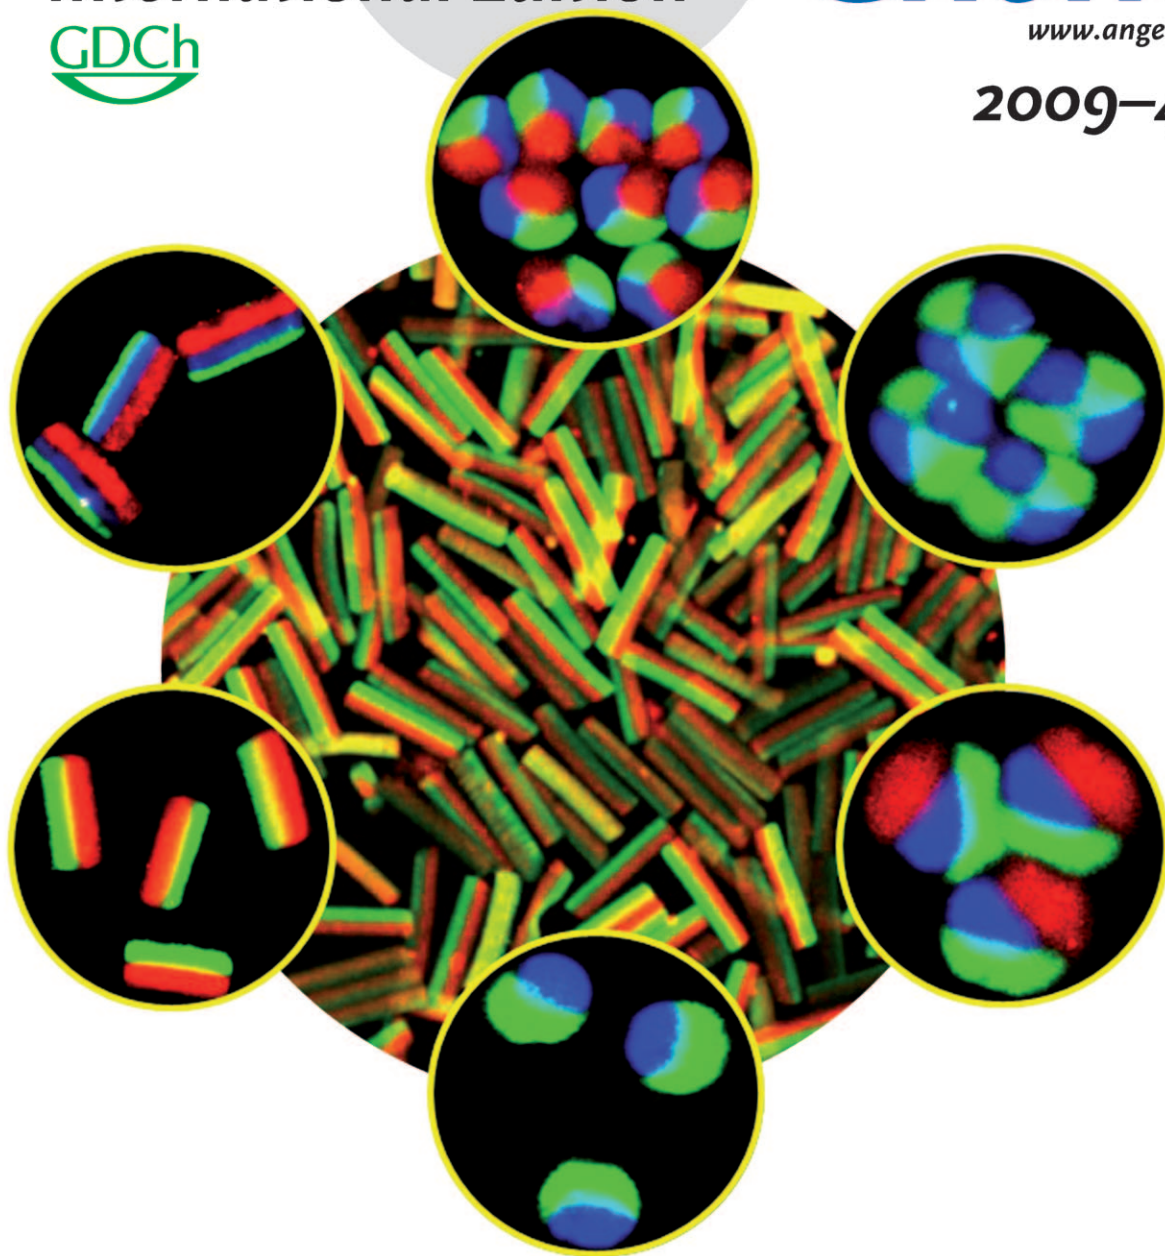

Angewandte Chemie

International Edition

www.angewandte.org

2009–48/25

Multicompartmental microcylinders ...

... can be produced by a combination of electrohydrodynamic co-spinning and microsectioning, as described by J. Lahann et al. in their Communication on page 4589 ff. The number of individual compartments, relative compartment orientation, chemical composition and functionality, and aspect ratio can be precisely tuned. Each color in the longitudinal and cross-sectional micrograph images depicts an individual compartment.

 WILEY-VCH

Inside Cover

Srijanani Bhaskar, Jonathon Hitt, Sei-Won Laura Chang, and Joerg Lahann*

Multicompartmental microcylinders can be produced by a combination of electrohydrodynamic co-spinning and microsectioning, as described by J. Lahann et al. in their Communication on page 4589 ff. The number of individual compartments, relative compartment orientation, chemical composition and functionality, and aspect ratio can be precisely tuned. Each color in the longitudinal and cross-sectional micrograph images depicts an individual compartment.

