

Editorial

1994 brings the arrival of six issues of Oral Oncology annually, a reflection of the tremendous success of the Journal, due in no small part to the rapid refereeing and handling of submitted papers. A great debt of gratitude is due to the various referees who have facilitated this process, and to those authors who have patiently awaited the publication of accepted papers that are in the pipeline while we have awaited an increase in the page allocation.

1994 also sees the change in address of my office to London, though papers should still be submitted to the EJC office at Millman Street, London. As in any move of address, there may be one or two teething problems and I therefore ask forbearance of authors over this period.

Professor Crispian Scully